In fact, it now lightens some of the perils of their journey by means of fish ladders. These are steps four feet wide and less than a foot high. They are built at the side of steep rapids so that the fish can ascend slowly rather than be bruised by dashing against rocks while leaping wildly.

We gladly humor the whims of the salmon. For it is not alone the dramatic story of its homesickness that interests us. The "big, handsome, symmetrical fish," an old cook book describes the "mon, is very rich in phosphor-"
